Tequila

Tequila is made by distilling the fermented juice of agave plants. It is descended from pulque, a favorite alcoholic drink of the Aztecs and other Indian tribes. Agave (taken from the Greek meaning magnificent), a pre-historic plant, is a spiky leafed member of the Lily family, not a cactus.

By México law, tequila is produced from blue agave only, one of Mexico's hundreds of varieties of agave. (Mezcal on the other hand, can be made from other species of agave. Tequila is a specific type of mezcal. All tequila is mezcal, but not all mezcal is tequila).

Tequila is produced in specifically designated geographic regions of México, most notably Jalisco. The more elaborate bottled Tequila sometimes contain a "worm", a caterpillar like bug that bores into the plant. The survival of its body, intact, is said to be a sign of the spirit's high alcohol content and the consumption of the worm an enhancement of malice.

The cheaper, colorless tequila are matured for only a few weeks. Others may be colored and softened on the palate, with caramel or almond essence. Those labeled Reposado have been matured in oak tank for up to 6 months. Those with the description Añejo, have been kept for at least a year, often 2 or 3 and occasionally 8-10 years, in oak barrels usually obtained from Kentucky bourbon distillers.
